

1 Retrospective

Under the scope of this last chapter, I make a reflection of my internship at Brainjar and one on my personal development.

1.1 Assignment reflection

I am quite satisfied with the result I have been able to achieve now that my internship at Brainjar is completed. I did not immediately realize something useful for the company itself, but rather for the people who work there.

However, projects like this are never finished, as there is always room for improvement. Market conditions change almost constantly, so one must always continue to make strategic adjustments. For example, there is still an enormous amount that can be done regarding the origin of our signals, the management of risk and the backtesting of the algorithm.

The only thing I can comment on towards my internship company is the frequency of the standup meetings (daily). You simply can't show something new every single day. On the other hand, I certainly understand the reason why, it was a very challenging project as in you don't always know where to start.

1.2 Personal reflection

The internship for me was a kind of connection between my professional interest (programming) and my private one (trading). More than anything, it taught me the importance of having knowledge in multiple domains.

Throughout my internship, I have made the most progress in analyzing and problem solving. As mentioned earlier, the project was completely self-contained, so it was up to me to analyze, assess and look for clever solutions to the current situation.

It was a huge learning experience for me that influenced my vision in many different ways.
